It is the hope of an

to be tried to defeat the tactics of the volley by playing down the side lines, or conversely across the court, was compelled to give his "returns" an elevation which greatly diminished their severity, and which gave a volleyer station in the centre of the court ample time to run and reach them. The lowering of a net by six inches at the poles has had the effect of placing the "attack" and "defence" upon more equal terms, so enabling players from the base line to attack their "returns" as effectively and severally as was previously possible. It is true that the net were lowered still another six inches at poles, the "attack" and "defence" would be brought still nearer to an equality, and the extinction of a conflict almost in the same proportion. The "attack" law tennis is made by the player from the base line; the "defence" by him who is in the service; and with a net which rises from the centre to the poles to the extent of six inches, the volley from the service line is in the position an army defending a battle. The angle cannot attack upon a broad front, and he attempts to outflank the defence, and to make wide use of the principle of covering the net, and the deliberation that it would make and repulsed half-way "defence," in a word, can anticipate a considerable confidence the precise position at which the "attack" will be delivered while the assaulting party cannot gain where the "counter-attack" which will be made. The principle of covering the net, and the raising of the poles would be further to uncover the flanks of a volley from the service line. It would not be "volleying" to be less effective, more in playing than at present, but it would be more difficult to practise successfully in order to protect his flanks, and he would be compelled to use the poles position, and every lawn tennis player is aware that the further one is from the net, the more difficult it is to volley a ball with accuracy.
